Information from Networks

The networks describing the interaction between different biological entities can yield a lot of interesting information if analyzed properly. This talk will describe the analysis of two kinds of networks: metabolic networks and causal regulatory networks. We will construct mathematical models to ask questions of each kind of network, describe the algorithms required to provide answers, and finally discuss the kind of biological insights that arise from this analysis.